

At 63 years of age, I can assess my life on this planet as being one of determined completion, that possibly I will not have to return in order to take care of any unfinished business, and if my divine counselors approve, I might consider coming back only to celebrate life the way it was created to be lived.

A quick overview of my life, so far, displays a colorful contrasting landscape with very few beaten paths. Non-conformant tones echo through the caverns, valleys, and plateaus. It is for certain this journey was designed to be expressed with surprising twists and turns that will stir any conforming thought to a challenge of its own wits.

The thing that I would most want to be remembered for is that of a human striving to become an authentic version of her real self, that others may see a way out of the limitations of the human condition, and be set free to embrace the unbeaten paths that lead to an authentic version of themselves as well.
